FIREFIGHTERS SAVE ENDANGERED FECES

Dung-ho firefighters of the National Park Service believe they have finally triumphed in putting out a blaze smoldering for nearly a year in a 25,000 year accumulation of giant Shasta sloth dung in a remote Grand Canyon cave. The fossilized fecula, apparently ignited by hikers, has been a stratified storehouse of information for paleobiologists and botanists making dung digs since its discovery in the 1930s. Dr. Clayton Ray of the Smithsonian Institution said the Shasta sloth, a creature with the chronic trots, "was not very notable except for producing a large and durable stool in the same place for about 25,000 years."

Do your dates yawn when you lead them to the loveseat? Has the "pop" gone out of "spin-the-bottle?" Add spice to your life and va-voom to your technique with the "Nip" kiss, the "Vacuum" kiss and the "Eyelash" kiss. Learn all about "Electric Kissing Parties" and much more from THE ART OF KISSING, $1.95 from Doubleday and Co., Inc.
